This document lists (a) every country in the eventual V-Dem database, (b) the years for which we have collect data or plan to collect data (in parentheses next to the entry); (c) the polities that comprise each country's 20th century history (even if falling outside the time-period that we wish to code); and (d) the borders of each country (wherever this might be unclear).

Many dates are approximate due to the inconclusive nature of a country's history. Note that changes in sovereignty often occur by stages, and marking these stages with specific dates can be challenging.

General sources for compiling this document include Wikipedia and Statesman.org. Additional sources, along with notes pertaining to specific countries, empires, and federations are contained in a separate document: "Countries, Empires, Elections (misc notes)"

"Country"

A V-Dem "country" is a political unit enjoying at least some degree of functional and/or formal sovereignty. This means that fully sovereign nation-states as well as colonies and protectorates and semi-autonomous administrative districts may qualify as countries.

A territory must claim sovereignty at some point in its history in order to qualify. Thus, Somaliland qualifies but not Puntland.

Judgments about what qualifies as a country should not be interpreted as judgments about sovereign claims to disputed territories. V-Dem does not take a position on whether Taiwan is part of China, whether the Western Sahara belongs to Morocco, or whether Somaliland should be recognized as an independent state. Our decisions are based on pragmatic criteria, as explained below.

In identifying countries for coding purposes the first objective is to identify "effective governance units." An effective governance unit should have a person or body exercising executive powers (HOS and/or HOG). It should enjoy some degree of autonomy from surrounding governance units, at least with respect to domestic affairs. It may embody considerable differences in governing style and in quality of democracy relative to surrounding regions. The concept of "self-rule" refers in this document to self-determination over domestic affairs (but not foreign affairs).

The second objective is to create coding units that are continuous through time, usually culminating in a contemporary nation-state. This is important because the contemporary nation-state serves as the primary unit of analysis in most studies, even when those studies extend back in time.

Generally, wherever countries are formally sovereign (in international law) they are treated as countries in V-Dem. Yet, the sovereignty of a country in international law is sometimes more extensive than the definition of a country in V-Dem. For example, China has formal sovereignty over Hong Kong, Macau, and Taiwan (at least, according to the PRC). However, we code these entities separately because they have a good deal of autonomy (in Taiwan's case, total autonomy) and because their polities work differently than the PRC's.

Likewise, we code most overseas holdings of an empire separately. It would make no sense to arrive at a single coding for the entire British Empire since there was enormous variation in governance styles across these territories – not to mention between the metropole and its colonies. That said, if anyone wishes to ascertain a single score for the British Empire (or portions thereof) along some dimension of democracy they can easily arrive at such a score by aggregating the scores of component entities. Our modular approach to coding allows for maximum flexibility.

Some contiguous empires, were administered in a fairly centralized fashion (in the 20th century). Thus, the Ottoman Empire, the Dutch East Indies, Ruanda-Urundi, the Russian Empire, and the USSR are coded as single countries. (Usually, this coding is generated by country experts recruited to code the eventual nation-state that forms the core of the empire or colony. Thus, coders for Russia code the Russian Empire and the USSR.)

These codes are then used to generate continuous historical coding for countries that emanated from these empires. Thus, Kazakhstan is understood as part of the Russian Empire (1900-17) and then as part of the Soviet system (1917-90). It is coded independently from 1990. (This on-set date is chosen under the assumption that Kazakhstan was beginning to enjoy some degree of autonomy prior to full independence in 1991.) A continuous time-series measuring various aspects of democracy in Kazakhstan across the 20th century may be generated by concatenating these scores – for the Russian Empire (1900-17), for Soviet Russia (1917-1990), and for independent Kazakhstan (1990-).

We generally code regions of an empire separately if they are governed differently from the rest of the empire or federation. Thus, Yemen, Iraq, and Egypt are coded independently throughout the Ottoman period, while Ottoman holdings in Europe and Anatolia are not. This judgment hinges on the extent to which a given territory is thought to fulfill the requirements of an “effective governance unit,” as described above.

Sometimes, historical control over a present-day country was divided between two powers. Here, we generally consider its history to belong with the power that had (a) greater territorial control (over the country's current territorial boundaries) or (b) control over the capital. Thus, Serbia is coded as part of Austria-Hungary not the Ottoman Empire because, although both controlled about the same amount of territory in the early 20th century, the capital (Belgrade) fell on the Austrian side.

On occasion, we double-code the same territory. For example, from 1952-93 Eritrea was formally a part of Ethiopia. Yet, it was not ruled in the same way as the rest of the country. In particular, there was a lot more repression. Clearly, Eritrea needs to be considered a part of Ethiopia and the regime's repression in Eritrea can't be defined out of the coding for Ethiopia. However, Eritrea also needs to be coded separately, precisely because its status was different and can't be inferred from the coding of Ethiopia.

Note that the coding of a country begins at a point in time when it is judged to have become an effective governance unit (generally accompanied by a declaration of independence) or has gained international recognition – whichever comes first. Separation from a larger unit (e.g., an empire) may result in a small temporal overlap between the end of one unit and the beginning of another. Thus, former Soviet republics are coded from 1990 even though the USSR endures formally until 1991.

Where present-day countries were formally joined as part of a larger unit we sometimes ask country experts for both countries to code the previous entity. This occurs for the following units: Rwanda-Urundi (1916-62; Rwanda, Burundi), Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland/Central African Federation (1953-63; Malawi, Zambia, Zimbabwe). This means that we have twice the normal complement of coders for these units. (Of course, not all of them may be able to code these historical entities, so this may not result in a large number of completed surveys.)
